

Adam Willis, a former Coventry City footballer now retired from the game, who is Ella's father), so were you cautious about getting involved with a celebrity? "I have a daughter so my priority is her, but Gary and I just got on well straight away. It's like I've known him all my life. I just adore him."

So the whole celebrity and fame game doesn't faze you?

"Actually it is a bit strange for me. The papers got wind of our relationship when we were spotted walking together in Richmond Park. The photos were published and they ran something like, 'Do you know this girl? Call this number.' Someone who knew me called in and that was it really. The first week it came out I was being followed by photographers when I was taking Ella to school and I didn't like that."

"Gary often gets approached when we are out and people are often so lovely I don't really mind."

Danielle, you're a natural in front of the camera here today - tell us about your modelling background.

"The modelling was a result of being an air stewardess. I left Cardiff at 17 before my A-levels and moved to London where I was hired by Virgin Atlantic. I wanted to travel but didn't fancy the backpacking route so working for an airline was perfect. I did the long-haul routes to Los Angeles and New York, with some work in the Caribbean. Five days in Antigua was a far way to rest between flights." You worked your way up from economy to serving

Danielle says she's hard on herself about her looks. "I am self-conscious... I like to be five inches taller. I'm a bit short for catwalk work. I do like my legs and my hair."
